MONTRÉAL, QC, January 29, 2013. The life sciences and health technologies (LSHT) cluster of the Montréal metropolitan area, known as Montréal InVivo, is very pleased with the announcement made today by Pierre Duchesne, Minister of Higher Education, Research, Science and Technology (MESRST), in connection with the MEDTEQ consortium funding.

"The health technologies sector needed an initiative of this scope to further stimulate technological innovation and promote the commercialization of innovations," said Nathalie Quimet, Interim Chief Executive Officer of Montréal InVivo. "The creation of MEDTEQ is based on the demonstration the sector makes of its ability to bring together the key actors of innovation around critical projects and to work together to ensure the success of these projects," she specified.

Montréal InVivo is pleased that the government is confirming, through this announcement, its view that the life sciences and health technologies sector is important. The presence of thirty-some partners from public research, industrial research and the hospital network within this consortium will facilitate the development of products and technologies whose chances for success will increase and for which integration in users' current practice should be easier.
